ABSTRACT

This study aims to test more widely the video of basic counseling skills at the relationship building stage as a learning medium in the Micro Counseling Course. Basic counseling skills are one of the mandatory prerequisites for all Guidance and Counseling students to be able to continue the counseling practicum lecture stage, both individually and in groups. The research approach used is quantitative with Research and Development research design which produces products in the form of videos of basic counseling skills along with their reviews which are used as learning media for Micro Counseling Courses as one of the innovative efforts in addressing the challenges of online lectures during the pandemic. This development research procedure uses a research design model of Borg & Gall (1983) with modified stages according to limitations and assumptions to maximize each stage of the research. The stages used are: 1) product revision, 2) operational test, 3) final product review, 4) initial product trial, and 5) dissemination and implementation. The subjects involved in this study were six potential users of the product from three higher education institutions providing guidance and counseling study programs.

In the video presented visualization of basic counseling skills by counselors who are considered wrong and visualizations of basic skills by counselors that are correct or recommended. Furthermore, it ends with a video plot that reviews theoretically related to the basic skills of visualization of counselor counseling which is wrong and right. The results of the study were an analysis of the results of the agreement of prospective users on the usefulness, feasibility and accuracy of the Basic Counseling Skills Video and obtained an increase of 29.85714286 as the average increase in conceptual understanding and practice of basic counseling skills.
