ABSTRACT

This study aims to describe the need for guidance and counseling services to develop the resilience of elementary school students. The data were obtained through a questionnaire containing the understanding of guidance and counseling services, the implementation of guidance and counseling services, and the classroom teacher's understanding of resilience. This study involved 108 elementary school classroom teachers. The findings show that teachers' understanding of guidance and counseling services in elementary schools is only about 20%, the implementation of guidance and counseling services in elementary schools is still not well planned, most teachers have understood resilience but have not developed the resilience of their students through learning
